Youth mobility, food security and rural poverty reduction (RYM)

PROJECT OVERVIEW

Project title: Youth mobility, food security and rural poverty reduction: Fostering rural diversification through enhanced youth employment and better labour mobility (RYM)

Code: GCP/INT/240/ITA

Countries: Tunisia and Ethiopia

Duration: 2 years

Budget: USD 2.5 million

Donor: Italy

Context

In 2015, there were 244 million international migrants, representing an increase of 40% since 2000. They included 150 million migrant workers. One-third of all international migrants are aged 15 to 34. The phenomenon of internal migration is even larger in scale, with 763 million internal migrants according to 2013 estimates.

Distress economic migration is particularly acute among rural youth. Relative to adult household members, youth are more likely to migrate. Lack of decent jobs in rural areas and the unattractiveness of agriculture push young people to seek more productive and better-remunerated employment opportunities elsewhere. Youth are also likely to move from one rural area to another to take advantage of different seasonal calendars of farm production or to move to urban areas and abroad to find non-farm jobs. As a result, every year rural areas lose a vital and potentially most dynamic share of their workforce as youth migrate to cities or move abroad in search of better livelihood opportunities.

FAO’s role

FAO has a comparative advantage in exploring the links between migration, agricultural and rural transformation processes. Through its strong technical expertise and close relation with governments and agricultural stakeholders, FAO works to maximize positive impacts of migration, particularly in rural areas.

In particular, FAO’s work on migration aims to foster rural-urban linkages, advocate for a better management of rural labour mobility, and promote the investment of remittances in agriculture and rural areas. FAO also strives to ensure safe mobility, by increasing incentives for regular migration and promoting good practices, for instance on seasonal agricultural migration. Such interventions should be coordinated with initiatives geared towards increasing youth’s involvement in the agricultural sector. Promoting rural youth employment and agro-entrepreneurship is key to reduce involuntary and distress rural out-migration, and generate viable options for rural people.

Approach

The Youth mobility, food security and rural poverty reduction (RYM) project is structured in global and country level components. The aim is to address the root causes of migration in countries of origin and promote innovative mechanisms to youth employment in rural areas, thereby reducing distress rural out-migration of young people. FAO will achieve these objectives by improving knowledge and awareness on the potential of migration and economic mobility for youth employment in agriculture; and improving policy coherence, with a focus on addressing the root causes of migration and facilitating opportunities for youth through seasonal employment and agro-entrepreneurship. At country level, the proposed programme will be implemented in Tunisia and Ethiopia, with different sets of activities adapted to the two country contexts.

At regional and global level, the project will contribute to FAO’s normative work on migration in global fora and generate evidence and lessons learned that will inform the European debate on migration and the dialogue between the European Union and African countries.

Expected results
The project will reduce distress economic migration of the rural youth by strengthening national capacities and supporting the countries in developing and implementing policies and programmes that promote rural youth employment. FAO attaches particular importance to ensure the sustainability of the intervention over time, and it does so by involving relevant stakeholders in policy consultations, aligning activities to the national priorities, and providing technical support to key policy processes.
