Antimicrobial resistance (AMR) is a global problem that impacts all countries and all people, regardless of their wealth or status. This side event is aimed at all member states to encourage a collaborative response to the challenge.

A One Health approach looks at the use of antimicrobials in humans, animals and plants to ensure food and nutrition security, sustainable ecosystems, and public health. To combat AMR successfully a One Health approach is fundamental.

This will be a dynamic discussion on the recommendations of the UNSG's Inter Agency Coordination Group on AMR and the feasibility of implementing a One Health approach in different member state settings across humans, animals, and the environment.
